Kirkmichael's walls start to climb towards the sky – and the roof is next!

Great progress this summer! Anyone who has passed Kirkmichael recently will notice that the blue protective sheeting which once protected the fragile gables has gone – and the building suddenly looks much bigger and taller. The skilled LTM Ltd team – which includes several local apprentices being trained in traditional building skills - has been gently mortaring, straightening and consolidating the walls.

Recycled old slates, carefully selected to match the surviving original Ballachulish/Easdale slate, are awaiting installation. These will be used in diminishing courses ranging from 'Duchesses' (24" x 12") and 'Countesses' (20" x 10") right down to wee 'undersized' (10" x 6") to make the new roof look more steeply angled than it really is, traditional in the Highlands. Even broken slate will be recycled as a Grant-Dunbar Mausoleum base layer, to prevent weed regrowth.

In July and August we finally saw works commence on site, planned a guided walk of Kiltearn and Aness, visited Caithness Horizons to view their collection of Pictish Stones, assisted expert photography team John Borland and Zoe Ballantine from Historic Environment Scotland (thank you both!) in photographing, recording and assessing the current condition of all the medieval Resolis Stones identified to date and issued a mid-project outputs report which shows we are ahead of most public engagement targets to date. Visitors also enjoyed our Naturally Kirkmichael event held jointly with RSPB and Butterfly Conservation Highland (thanks again, folks!): among the more unusual wildlife identified was this beautiful Yellow-Shouldered Thorn moth photographed by Andrew Dowsett (enjoy more event pix on www.facebook.com/KirkmichaelTrust).

Please support our Building Conservation Day, a two-site celebration of traditional building skills on Saturday 17th Sept. This starts at Kirkmichael itself from 12 noon until 14.30 with LTM demonstrations of lime-burning (fantastic spectacle, lots of hissing and sizzling!) and stone conservation. Our day then continues 15.00 – 18.00 at the big Resolis Primary School Country Show (NB £5 entry charge to school funds includes a dance in the evening). Our relocated marquee will offer 'ask the expert' on building conservation matters, further demonstrations and displays of conservation work, free giveaways of Historic Environment Scotland Conservation advice packs and free Kirkmichael Creative make & take crafts.

STOP PRESS Find us too in the superb new 2016 Highland Archaeology Festival events programme (1st – 14th October, see www.highlandarchaeologyfestival.org/calendar.asp, www.kirkmichael.info and www.facebook.com/KirkmichaelTrust). We will also be offering free bookable workshops in building conservation techniques such as limeburning, stone masonry techniques and metalworking on the week of 24th October, and archaeology volunteering opportunities for three weeks from 17th October – email Verity on verity@interpretation.com or call on 01381 620575 - she will let you know as the details are finalised.
